The Dispensationalist divides time into distinct "dispensations." I suspect there are clearly different theoretical and empirical strands of embodied cognition. Wilson, ; Kiverstein, to a greater or lesser extent they all challenge the isolated computational mind of cognitivism, which lacks a brain, a body and a culture. Edelman, By locating the brain in the body of an active, agentive organism, embodiment threatens the clear distinctions between perception input cognition information processing and action the execution of instructions or output that underpin the cognitivist account.
